

How To Select The Right Dispensing System

SELECTION CRITERIA	WHAT TO EVALUATE	WHY IT MATTERS FOR EMS COMPANIES
Application Type	Adhesive dispensing, solder paste jetting, underfill, conformal coating, dam-and-fill, and thermal interface materials	Different applications require different dispensing technologies such as needle dispensing, auger valves, or jetting systems
Material Characteristics	Viscosity, density, curing method (UV, thermal), and mix ratio (1K/2K materials)	Material properties determine pump type, valve design, and system configuration
Dispensing Accuracy and Repeatability	Required dot size, volume control, and placement accuracy (often $\pm 0.1\text{mm}$ or better)	High precision ensures reliable solder joints, proper adhesive bonding, and reduced defects
Production Volume	Prototype, high-mix low-volume, or high-volume manufacturing	High-volume SMT lines may require high-speed jetting systems, while prototypes may use benchtop dispensers
Throughput Requirements	Boards per hour, cycle time, and takt time	Faster dispensing increases line productivity and reduces bottlenecks in SMT production
PCB and Component Complexity	PCB size, component density, fine-pitch devices, and 3D structures	Complex boards require high-precision motion systems and advanced vision alignment
Integration with SMT Line	Compatibility with conveyors, pick-and-place machines, and SMEMA/IPC-Hermes interface	Seamless integration ensures smooth material flow and automated production
Automation Level	Manual, semi-automatic, and inline fully automatic systems	Automated dispensing improves consistency, reduces operator errors, and increases throughput
Process Monitoring	Vision systems, closed-loop control, and IoT monitoring	Real-time monitoring improves yield and reduces material waste
Total Cost of Ownership (TCO)	Machine cost, maintenance, consumables, energy usage	EMS companies must consider lifecycle costs rather than just initial equipment price
Service and Support	Local service network, spare parts availability, and training	Reliable after-sales support reduces downtime and maintains production stability
Scalability	Ability to upgrade heads, add jetting modules, and multi-material dispensing	Flexible systems support future product designs and new materials
