

THE SEASONS

Earth spins on a tilted axis, so as it orbits the Sun once a year the North Pole points towards the Sun in June and away from it in December. This means that in regions north of the tropics it is summer in June but winter in December—and the opposite to the south of the tropics. Near the Equator it is always warm, but there are annual wet and dry seasons.

