

The Nemean lion had skin that could not be pierced by weapons. So Heracles followed the lion to its cave and wrestled with it. After strangling it to death, he returned to Eurystheus, wearing the lion's skin as armour.

Heracles successfully completed task after task. His eleventh task was to steal some golden apples that grew on a tree in a garden that was guarded by three maidens called the Hesperides [hes-PAIR-i-deez], along with a fierce serpent.
