

Deucalion and Pyrrha were thrown around on the waves.

The illustration shows a man and a woman in white robes inside a dark, rectangular chest. They are floating on a turbulent sea with large, dark blue waves. The man is holding a white scroll and a blue bowl, while the woman is holding a blue jug. In the background, there are dark, stormy clouds and a bright yellow lightning bolt striking down.

Deucalion returned home and hastily set to work on the chest. Soon, rivers began to burst their banks, lakes overflowed, and the seas started to rise. Just as Prometheus had predicted, the flood had come.

The king and queen clambered into the finished chest and floated on the waves as their kingdom disappeared beneath the water. When the people tried to run to the mountains, Zeus threw thunderbolts to break apart the land in front of them.

For nine days, the rain poured down, and Deucalion and Pyrrha were tossed around on the waves.

Finally, the rain stopped and the chest came to rest gently on a small patch of dry land. Zeus watched as Deucalion and Pyrrha climbed out and was impressed by their escape. “I will grant you one wish,” he said.

Deucalion asked at once for a new people to rule over. Zeus agreed and threw a stone at Deucalion’s feet. From this stone, a new group of humans sprang up. These people lived in peace with the gods.

The stone transformed into a new group of men and women.