

juveniles lose their buff face feathers as they mature, leaving a patch of white cheek skin

red throat sac

^ CROWN AND COLOUR

This species sports a bristly golden crown, a neat black forehead, and bare white cheeks, edged with a patch of red, which is broader in East African birds. Both males and females have a red throat sac that can be inflated with air, then rapidly deflated to give a booming call.

neck feathers lack
interlocking barbs,
giving a loose,
"hairy" appearance