

1 To begin, the fukusa, a square silk cloth used to clean and purify the tools used in the ceremony, is folded. The fukusa is held by the two diagonal corners and a fold is made a third of the way down from the long edge.

2 It is then folded down in the opposite direction into thirds, folded in half lengthwise, and, finally, in half again.

3 The two edges are then folded into one another, or over the implement to be purified. The host ritually cleans all of the implements in front of the guests in preparation for the ceremony.
